Street corners have always been space that has belonged to men — patriarchal territory. The feminist movement did not change that. Just as it was not powerful enough to take back the night and make the dark a safe place for women to lurk, roam, and meander at will, it was not able to change the ethos of the street corner — gender equality in the workplace, yes, but the street corner turns ...

Belonging: A Culture of Place. Routledge, 2008, 240 pages. Not until her family moved to town and better schools did she become aware of the "imperialist white supremacist capitalistic patriarchy" that she identifies in Kentucky and America. She was, she acknowledges, taught by her family that the poor white folks who lived around them were all racist; she also notes that the blacks of the community held poor whites in the same contempt that the upper-class whites did.
